They Wanted a Ghost Story.
"Speaking of ghost stories," said one of a party at dinner in the studio home of one of the best known artists in New York a few evenings ago, "I know a perfectly horrid one, but"—with a stifled prod of conscience—"it's a terrible ghoulish one for an after dinner story."

"Oh, do tell it," chimed in a chorus of dense heads striving against submersion in a sea of after dinner drowsiness.

"The dinner had been a swell affair and we had sat long at table sipping wine to the tune of witty toasts, growing more solemn and intense with the black coffee and cognac. It was past 10 o'clock and the studio proper to which we had adjourned was a fitting background for our overwrought fancies, with the broken archways, broken armor, tiger rugs and general artistic disorder, flicked by the light of waxen candles and pungent with the scent of some foreign subtle incense burning in a brazier swinging in an alcove.

"Well, since you insist upon it," resumed the prospective blood curdler, finding room in an imaginary angle of the sofa for one more cushion, "Once upon a time there was a certain young girl, a writer, in a boarding house of this city, who made it her boast that she never had been and never could be frightened.

"Her fellow boarders accused her of bluff and agreed—with her consent—that they would frighten her if they could. Among these were two young medical students, who a few days later brought home from the hospital dissecting room a man's arm, perfect from the shoulder joint, and with the abutment of some young ladies in the house concealed it in the victim's bed.

"At the usual time the young lady bade them good night and retired to her room.

"They heard the key turn in her door, and then followed on tiptoe to await developments. After waiting a reasonable length of time they began to grow nervous. Finally the suspense grew intolerable. They rapped on her door, but received no answer. Again and again they rapped, but the silence within was absolute and ominous.

"Then they grew desperate. They called and threatened to break the door in.

"Silence still.

"Then they went to the landlady, explained the situation and asked for a latchkey to her room. This, however, they could not use on account of the other key in the door.

"They became frantic.

"Then they broke the door, and the girl who you suppose they found? The girl was in her night dress, the gas turned out, and in the dim light of a low grate fire flitting dimly on the walls she sat on the side of the bed gazing at that arm and muttering horrible gibberish. She was stark, staring mad!"

"The matter looked up from the rug upon which his eyes had been bent when he spoke. Eleven pale faces, twenty-two horror stricken, glaring eyes confronted him. The tapers burned low, and cold draughts came through invisible crevices, tracing our spines with icy finger tips. Each one waited for some one else to say something conventional. It was very awkward for the host, but he was equal to the occasion.

"John," he remarked to the servant, "just pass around the bottle." In a short space of time the exigencies of a "quarter limit" game had driven the ghastly story from our minds.—N. Y. Herald.

A MAN UNDER THE BED.—About two weeks ago a smooth-faced young man, who said he was Harold McLaughlin, of Philadelphia, applied to Nathaniel Horner, a boarding house keeper in New York, for a room. McLaughlin had only been in the house a short time when the boarders began to complain that articles of value were missing from their rooms. Mr. Horner discovered that $50 had been abstracted from a roll of bills which he kept in his trunk. On Wednesday afternoon Miss Baker, who is also a boarder at the house, had a little experience. "I went up to my room about 4 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon," Miss Baker said, "and proceeded to take a sponge bath and make my toilet. Then I lay down on the lounge to get a few minutes' rest. I could see under my bed, and something there attracted my attention. There was a pair of feet clad in black stockings and I caught a glimpse of a white shirt sleeve. I rushed into the hall and called for Mr. Horner." The man under the bed was McLaughlin, who was arrested, and most of the missing property was found in his possession. He confessed the thefts.
